Excerpt: . . . 11 Because of these functional realities we have looked for alternatives that will address both security and operational concerns. The most desirable approach, in our view, would be to develop a real-time, interactive, go no-go process that would permit passport data to be swiped and transmitted, and an answer provided on the spot - not unlike approval of a credit-card transaction. The Australian government utilizes a process along these lines for pre-approving passengers traveling to Australia from anywhere in the world. While, without question, the scale of travel to and from the United States is orders of magnitude larger, and a U. S. system would be significantly more complex, we believe this real-time approach would be infinitely more practical than any alternative. Should that prove unworkable, however, we believe that other alternatives should be explored including rolling transmissions of APIS data as a flight builds to departure - leaving only a modest percentage of passengers for last-minute clearance or, conceivably, an earlier collection of APIS data. We recently advised Secretary Chertoff of our commitment to working with the department to develop a practicable solution and, we remain committed to this goal. In conclusion, I would like to emphasize three critical points: First, the airline industry's commitment to security is absolute - we fully recognize that the security and safety of our operations must be unquestionable; at the same time, we are committed to the protection of our customers legitimate privacy...
