Excerpt: .the children out in asylums or private families they board them out in their own mothers homes. That is, the state pays to indigent mothers the stipends which it had formerly paid for the children's upkeep in strange places. So long as Society recognizes the support of such children as one of its obligations, this plan has decided advantages over those to which we are more accustomed. It is hardly necessary to insist that the care of a decent, conscientious mother is likely to produce better results than that of the best institution in the world. And, properly managed, such care costs the state no more, perhaps not as much, so that Society ought to score a positive gain. Abuses are possible, of course, but their correction is a matter of administrative detail. New York is the latest state to adopt this reform,...
